Santa Fe Society Notes

DORCAS AND PRISCILLA.

Lent is still so far off, that it can't be ascribed to its influence that society is turning from bridge to sewing and finds the exercise with the thread and needle more fascinating than dancing. The fact that generally quite an elaborate supper is served to the hostess, or at least a cup of tea and wafers, may have something to do with it. "There is a satisfaction in getting something worth while done," is the reason that one young matron gave, but that would hardly be a compelling cause, that would change suddenly the trend of society in a community. "One can't play bridge with some twenty or thirty others jabbering," is the way another matron put it when asked her reason why she goes to the sewing afternoon rather than to the bridge club. Be that as it may, one afternoon after another is being taken up with sewing parties while bridges and dancing to the symphony in yellows, but to the light in the eyes, the inviting impersonation of the spirit of youth. Again in the portrait of Mrs. Hewitt, there is the perfect likeness that every friend recognizes immediately, and beyond that, just a gleam in his eyes, an imperious smile of the lips, a subtle mystery that distinguishes the portrait from the best production of the skilled photographer and gives it life. How the artist treats a more difficult subject is illustrated by his portrait of Miss Beatrice Seligman of the Santa Fe high school, daughter of Postmaster and Mrs. James L. Seligman, whose portrait has a place of honor in the exhibit.

In his portrait of Indians, Cassidy is especially happy. He has a way of giving Indian types in this exhibit. The most pretentious is "The Artist," a splendid Indian figure studying a piece of pottery. The arrangement, the harmony of blues, the luminous yellows and warm browns in the foreground, and the distances of the sky, proclaim the picture a masterpiece. "Juan Domingo," an Indian with a red blanket, wrapped about his shoulders, was exhibited in the American Water Color society and traveled with the American Federation of Arts exhibit for which only the best and most representative paintings are selected. Most people, perhaps, will like "Firelight, Taos," best for its subtlety, cheerfulness and careful workmanship. "Acoma Path," carrying a panoply, is a decidedly pleasing composition, both as to portraiture and the land background. It is a water color, "Apache Boy Against Wall," and "Hugh of Orabai," are two sketches that appeal. "The Laughing Girl," is an appealing bit of color to which one turns repeatedly just to catch the contagion of that smile. "The First Dancing Lesson," "Boy With a Bow," "Tessie Man," "Acoma Man," "Big Sister," "The Corn Dancer," "Apache Boy," a striking portrait of a boy evidently afflicted with trachoma, giving the face an expression that is so characteristic that it might be called a medical study—"Big Mike," and "The Shepherd," are all well done and would each of them add a touch of beauty to any home.

Charles L. Freer, the famous millionaire art connoisseur and American foremost critic, recently bought one of Cassidy's more ambitious works. Mrs. Christian of Minneapolis, a well known art lover, has been another heavy purchaser. Of particular interest to Santa Feans, are the series of studies of the cliff dwellers and Pueblo Indian region, made for the great mural paintings of Cassidy's in the Indian Arts building at the Panama-California International Exposition. There is prehistoric Santa Fe, the Puye and other familiar landscape features of the Pajarito National park, all of them exquisitely done, with plenty of atmosphere, sunshine and desert. Of the mural decorations exhibited, is one of the "Van Winkle" series for Dr. Crump of New York City. The mural will find a place in the doctor's Catskill bungalow which is in the region of Sleepy Hollow, made famous by Washington Irving's magic pen. The mural occupies an entire wall in the receiving room of the old Palace and shows Rip Van Winkle after his long sleep gazing at the lovely valley beneath him. The painting is in a high key and would glorify any home or palace. Another large composition is "The Shepherd," sold to a Denver purchaser, and "Hopi Land," sold to a Minneapolis buyer. Both are southwestern landscape studies with all the rich coloring and sunshine characteristic of this region.

"Santa Fe River, Snow Scene," gives a glimpse of the Capital city scenery that is unusual. One can readily see how this landscape with its bright splashes of color would brighten up a room in which it was hung. "Old California House," is a pleasing and "Sketch of Pecos Mountains," visualizes the grandeur of the country round about Taos.

Perhaps, it is in his marines, that Cassidy reaches the greatest perfection of his art. One hesitates to choose among such splendid paintings as "The Sheep Trail, Acoma Island," "The Fog Bank," and "Sand Dunes," the last being sold. The possessor of any of these three could deem himself fortunate. "Sea Beach," is an admirable little sketch and so is "San Diego Bay and Point Loma." Mr. Cassidy does not exhibit his great mural "San Juan Capistrano," just completed for the Hotel Gramatan, New York, but it is still in the Parsons studio and will not be sent east for some time. The exhibit is a most satisfying one, not only to the art student, but to the average laymen besides. Cassidy's versatility, is nothing short of marvelous, but in this case versatility does not go to the procreancy, it is merely an indication of a stupendous industry and comprehensive genius.

Before leaving the exhibit, one should turn again to the sketch of the greatest of the mural paintings in the Indian Arts building at San Diego. The historian of the clan of man, his probable ancestor as his cliff dwellers points to the ruins of the home of his ancestors and the
